and information about birds that may have visited your backyard. At any time of year, you can look around in your backyard and a colorful little bird will catch your eye. After watching the birds in my backyard for a few months, I decided to intentionally attract them to the backyard more often. I went to the local library and begin a research on birds. I discovered that children and adults are fascinated by birds and that millions of people in the United States participate in feeding wild birds. This trend is rapidly growing today. In my research I found that birds require four basic things to survive in the wild: food, fruits and berries, tree sap, flower nectar, the tender young leaves and buds of grass trees, and shrubs. Birds can be resourceful in finding water: a birdbaths, rain puddles, garden hoses and streams. Birds protect their young from cats and squirrels by building nesting holes in tree trunks. They build
