The Palaces were large, multi-storied buildings which were home to the king and royal family. They tended to be made of stone with wooden structures on top. Roofs were made of thatch. Some Maya palaces are spacious, including courtyards, different structures that were possibly homes, patios, towers, etc. The palace at Palenque is a good example.

The Mojave tribe lived in two different kinds of houses. In the summer and spring when they fished in the Colorado River they'd live in thatched huts raised of the ground by stilts. It was made by wooden frame and covered with grass or brush. These thatched huts or wickiups would protect them from summer flooding.

Think: thatched roofs and mud floors. That's a hut. The tent I lived in for a summer in Alaska was a hut. The magnificent retreats you offer to hikers are palaces compared to huts. OK. Maybe palace isn't the right word either. Most palaces have electricity; but, toilets, huge breakfasts and dinners, and evening entertainment sure beats camping ...
